Picture: izusek/E+/Getty Images Many believe the 1980s was the dawn of the digital age. New technologies have appeared in almost every aspect of life. From heart transplants and compact synthesizers to personal computers and DNA mapping, no one could deny that the 80s was a big deal. Fashion was no exception, with bright neon colours littering the landscape. And with a loud fashion came even louder music. The music was fun, catchy and, most importantly, danceable. Instead of performing live, many hits had music videos, each with a bigger production budget than the last. To show the world the true definition of a music video, Michael Jackson released Thriller in 1983, the third video from his album of the same name. Director John Landis and special effects guru Rick Baker (director and make-up artist of the Academy for American Werewolf in London) helped bring to life thematic video of Michael Jackson. And with horror icon Vincent Price providing a voice-over and a 45-minute documentary after him, Thriller became a masterpiece. It wasn't just men spending big money on videos. Madonna had plenty of tuxedo-clad men in her Material Girl video. She then followed that up with a lion and a trip to Venice and New York for her As a Diva video. She even held a competition that decades for bragging rights (and $25,000) to create a concept for her True Blue video. The theme song Generation, written and performed by Tonic Emerson Hart, takes listeners back to a time when life was much easier and safer. With lyrics like we just want to dance the night long . . . And.... This may be the only time around . . . the song is inspired to capture the day's attitude. The show had an unusually loyal fan base, but the bad time slots assigned to NBC led to low ratings, and the show unexpectedly topped off after season three ended with a cliffhanger that left fans disappointed and more eddying. It starred Jerry Van as the owner of a 1928 Porter convertible obsessed with his deceased mother (Anne Sothern), whose voice came out of the car radio. Even though Allan Burns and Chris Hayward had success with The Munsters, the show was panned by critics. However, my mother's car managed to survive a year, but in the end, a country that loved talking horse just wasn't ready to talk car.
